Course summary The Summer Institute on Sexuality, Culture and Society is an intensive four-week summer course, which focuses on the study of sexuality across cultures and is taught by an international faculty team.

Course description The Summer Institute on Sexuality, Culture and Society was founded in 1995. The aim of the course is to explore and study the social and cultural dimensions of human sexuality and gain training in areas of sexuality research - both theory and method - not commonly available in other institutions. The participation of an international multidisciplinary faculty and students from different educational and cultural backgrounds provides a fruitful and challenging atmosphere enjoyed by students and faculty alike. During seminars, lunches, and weekly "get-togethers," conversations, and activities, informal contacts between the faculty, students, and guest lecturers flourish. The sharing of varied experiences, research, plans of work, and perspectives provide a unique networking opportunity, thereby increasing participants' knowledge within an international context. Additionally, Amsterdam is an ideal location for the Summer Institute. The open atmosphere and small scale of the city is experienced by both western and non-western students as a refreshing stimulant for active discussion of sexuality and culture.

Morning classes are for all students. In the afternoon the programme consists of two tracks:

Study subjects	track 1 is designed for those who can indicate a sincere commitment to the study of sexuality. Track 2 is specifically for students with an elaborated research proposal related to the field, and includes a research seminar.
Course objectives	To provide participants with knowledge and training regarding theories and methods of sexuality research. Participants will develop insight into methods and techniques of the cross-cultural study of sexuality and gender, and are able to use this knowledge in designing, developing and working in research projects.
